

Theme

Vivacious ethical reflection has always been one of the central characteristics of Judaism, reflected in a centuries-old tradition of rabbinic discussion and interpretation of the Torah, the corpus of moral guidelines revealed by God to the Jewish people. As times changed Jewish authorities were time and again challenged to tackle new questions and dilemmas in accord with Jewish Scripture and moral standards. In the contemporary context as well the process of Jewish ethical reflection continues unabatedly. As a result of the achievements of modern medicine and the rapid development of biomedical technology during the past decades Judaism is challenged to formulate an answer to the bioethical questions and challenges this (r)evolution entails. Despite the rich and lively bioethical discussions among Jewish scholars and rabbis their voices often remain absent in Western European bioethical debates, led by the dominant Western ideological traditions - the Christian tradition and the non-religious humanist tradition.

In order to draw particular attention to Jewish perspectives on bioethical debates with regard to the care for ill and dying persons the Interdisciplinary Centre for the Study of Religion and World View organises, in cooperation with the Faculty of Religious Studies (Radboud Universiteit Nijmegen) and Institutum Iudaicum (the Interuniversity Centre for the Academic Study of Judaism in Belgium), an international academic expert seminar on Jewish end-of-life ethics. Attention will be paid to specific characteristics of Jewish (biomedical) ethics, as well as to the heterogeneous ethical perspectives in Judaism, particularly with regard to specific treatment decisions at the end of life. The aim of the international seminar is to give the floor to theoretical and empirical academic research on the topic, as well as to real-life cases and practical experiences. We invite distinguished international scholars, who are considered experts on the matter. Moreover, researchers are given the opportunity to present relevant academic research on the topic. The seminar aims at stimulating high-level academic discussion and dialogue.
